

The Pakistan Policy Symposium

February 2019

Introducing the Pakistan Policy Symposium Policy Brief Series

Michael Kugelman, Athar Javaid, and David Silverman

La ea , Pa t a , C a , Pa a P, c S , t , a -da

Pakistan has reached a pivotal moment in its 70-plus-year history.

On the one hand, the country has recently achieved some major milestones. It has dealt a devastating blow to the once-ferocious threat of anti-state terrorism. It has graduated to the status of emerging market. It has elected a new and non-dynastic political party that promises to usher in a refreshing new era of clean and efficient governance. And its foreign policy—spearheaded by a China-financed transport corridor that affords Pakistan new opportunities to become integrated into the global economy, and by a deepening of relations with key regional players such as Turkey and Russia—shows signs of entering a new and positive phase.

But at the same time, Pakistan is witnessing the emergence of a new generation of extremist organizations. It is suffering through a serious balance of payments crisis. Longstanding democratic challenges—from weak civilian institutions to a military that enjoys an outsize role in statecraft and policy—remain entrenched. And its foreign policy, which still struggles to develop deep partnerships beyond its Saudi and Chinese allies, remains framed by an India-centric lens and hampered by a global image problem.

In effect, Pakistan faces new and in some cases unprecedented opportunities, but it also confronts a series of major challenges both old and new.

How can Pakistan capitalize on its recent progress while conquering or at least managing the challenges that threaten to squander its recent achievements and new opportunities?

This was the overarching question that inspired and informed a two-day conference at the Wilson Center in October 2018. The event, co-hosted by the Wilson Center's Asia Program and the INDUS organization, and entitled Pathways to Change: Pakistan Policy Symposium, brought together thought leaders—analysts, journalists, academics, diplomats, and business people, among others—from both countries to discuss Pakistan's future and to offer policy recommendations on how the country can best move forward.

To prevent the symposium from getting consigned to the category of one-off, quickly forgotten event, the Wilson Center and INDUS have decided to put together a follow-up policy brief series. The objective is to convey the perspectives and recommendations shared by some of the conference speakers in a set of concise essays.

The essays featured here highlight the salient issues featured in the conference—issues that continue to play out in real time.

The first two essays assess U.S.-Pakistan relations. This up-and-down relationship struggled during the first year of the Trump administration's term, but it is now enjoying new life as the two countries work together to bring the Taliban to the negotiating table in an effort to end the U.S.-led war in Afghanistan. S. Paul Robinson, a former Pakistani foreign secretary, writes that "Pakistan and the United States need to arrive at a common assessment of solution.” He concludes that a “Pakistan-backed endgame in Afghanistan would offer a unique opportunity for a normalization of U.S.-Pakistan relations.”

The next two essays examine enduring challenges for Pakistan: extremism and the economy. Dr. Siddiqui, an assistant professor of political science at the University at Albany-State University of New York, discusses the recent emergence of several new hardline religious parties, one of which is tied to the terror group Lashkar-e-Taiba. Joining the political process, Dr. Siddiqui argues, is unlikely to make these groups more moderate. And yet, there are indications that “relevant stakeholders in Pakistani politics” have provided support to these groups. “If the Pakistani state wants to control the problem of radicalization in govt@pakistan.gov.pk | 011-35812000 | 011-35812000 | 011-35812000 | 011-35812000

The final essay highlights how to seize the opportunities offered by Pakistani-American financiers. Tareen, the head of innovation at Bed Bath & Beyond, and Jamil, the communication and outreach director for INDUS, explain that these diaspora members are “uniquely positioned partners in the promotion of investment and social entrepreneurship in Pakistan.” They have the potential to strengthen Pakistan’s economy, enhance its prospects to become a regional economic leader, and more broadly to bring more breadth to the U.S.-Pakistan relationship, according to Tareen and Jamil.

We hope these essays and their policy recommendations, much like the conference that preceded them, spark some useful debate about how Pakistan can best tackle a future rife with opportunities—but also fraught with obstacles.

The Wilson Center and INDUS would like to recognize the Houston Karachi Sister City Association, the American Pakistan Public Affairs Committee, Eye for Art, and the Middle East Institute for their sponsorship of the Pakistan Policy Symposium and this policy brief series. Their contributions and collaborative spirit are much appreciated.

Tareen is deputy director of the Asia Program and senior associate for South Asia at the Woodrow Wilson Center. Jamil is president of INDUS. Tareen is director of operations for INDUS.
